The Community Climate System Model ( CCSM ) simulates global cloud cover ( shown in white ) and precipitation ( in orange ). Composed of four separate models simultaneously simulating Earths atmosphere, ocean, land surface, and sea ice, and one central coupler component, the CCSM allows researchers to conduct fundamental research into Earths past, present, and future climate states. Credit: University Corporation for Atmospheric Research next-generation modeling. CCSM users have the ultimate goal of incorporating the interaction between global climate and all of Earths natural and human processes, capturing even subtle feedback loops. A future model, for example, might be able to estimate the health and geographic range of northern-latitude forests in times of higher temperatures, and monitor the ability of 21 those altered forests to absorb carbon dioxide from the atmosphere. Predicting the frequency and intensity of extreme weather events, such as hurricanes and severe local storms, in a warming world is also a priority goal for climate models.
