Carl was always a delicate child. During his boyhood his father led a wandering life, and Carl went with him everywhere. The Baron had given up his place as townmusician of Eutin and was now a theatrical manager. Whenever he could collect an audience he gave plays, with his older children as the actors. From Carl s birth, his father was determined to make an infant prodigy of him. The poor child was taught to sing and to strain his little fingers upon the piano keys almost as soon as he could speak, although he could not walk until he was four years old. He must have endured many hours of suffering at the piano, while his father stood over...
